Arizona Senator's Wife Once Made Weather Forecasts For the Cattlemen

Often Corrected the Bungles of the Bureau Officials at Washington and Gave Out Storm Warnings When the Washington Forecast Was "Continued Clear and Fair."

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 22.—Fifteen years ago she left Washington to establish a weather bureau station in Flagstaff, Ariz. Mrs. Henry Fountain Ashurst returned to the capital as the wife of one of the first senators from that State. In a very apartment in the Westmoreland, Mrs. Ashurst seems a long way from the little building that clung tenaciously to the wind-swept hillside, 7000 feet above sea level, on the frontier of the southwest. The lure of that wonderful country holds her, however, so, while compelled to endure the inconvenience of a more cramped landscape, she finds relief in telling of the wonders of a country of wonderful things. Attachments of the weather bureau at Phoenix went with her to Flagstaff and installed the instruments in the new station. Then she was left alone to do her part in the continent wide work, and how well she did it the records of the bureau in Washington can testify. Had to Rise Early. Every station in the country must take a reading at 5 o'clock, Washington time, so Mrs. Ashurst, then Mrs. Re-nault, was compelled to be up before 5.

Arizona time is two hours ahead of eastern time. She read the aneroid to get the direction and velocity of the wind, copied the record of the thermometer, which showed the variations in temperature during the preceding 24 hours, read the "wet and dry bulb" to learn the humidity, took down the record of the sunshine recorder, went to the large galvanised vessel that stood in a nearby open space and registered the precipitation, and exactly on the stroke of 6, took a reading of the two barometers. Then she worked out the barometric pressure at sea level at the freezing point, translated the result and those of the other operations into code, and filed the result with the local telegraph and the wind was blown to Washington. Such was the beginning of her day's work. These duties were entirely a matter of routine. It was in the matter of forecasts that the dauntless little woman showed her ingenuity. And this is a secret that has never leaked out until now, and weather bureau officials may prepare to be horrified. Something of a Weather Hack. "It is one thing to forecast the weather where changes come suddenly and where nothing is like it anywhere else. Consequently, when the Washington report read: 'Continued fair today and tomorrow,' and the wind was howling down from the mountains and carrying tons of stinging blinding snow with it, and the cattle and sheep men called up to know the forecast, the gentle representative found it necessary to 'mollify' or, at least, amend the report. And right here let it be said that when, in 1904, she resigned that office to marry the lawyer who later became a senator, those same men were of the opinion that the Washington weather bureau was an organization of wizards who never missed a forecast. For when Mrs. Ashurst found it necessary to do a little prognostication on her own responsibility, she kept it to herself. It is with great amusement that she relates an incident which occurred during a visit of one of the inspectors from the mail office here. He was going over one of the instruments, when a leading cattle man called up to know what the weather would be. "Continued fair," she answered. "If it is not storming when you go to bed tonight, it will be before you get up," said Mrs. Ashurst after a brief survey, "and it will be a big one." "What does the official report say?" asked the inspector in some astonishment after she had hung up the receiver. "Continued fair," she answered. "Great Scott, woman, don't you know you'll be fired if Washington finds you doing such a thing? What makes you think it's going to storm?" "Look at those barometers," said the undaunted woman. "They look as if they were empty, the fluid is so low. And look at those peaks; you never saw them look like that before," pointing to the two San Francisco peaks that loomed above them 14 miles distant. Sure enough, there was a peculiar haze about the summits, that in the clear atmosphere usually appeared but a mile or two distant. But the inspector only shook his head doubtfully, as she continued to give out such forecasts during the day. Undecided by Storm. That night a storm swept over the southwest that is still talked of in that country. How many thousand cattle and sheep Mrs. Ashurst saved by her intuitive was never computed. The inspector stayed until the hillside had abated, and then returned to Washington and Mrs. Ashurst never heard any further protests on her forecasts. Acting on advice from Washington, she investigated the great ice cave near Flagstaff and expounded a theory as to why its walls were always ice coated, in opposition to the popular belief that an underground river was the cause. Her explanation, now generally accepted, was first published in the monthly weather bureau report.

THINGS LOOK ROSY INDEED TO COBB

Democrats in Power, Republican Tariff to Be Wiped Out and a Good Job Is Coming His Way.

"I am delighted with the results of my trip to Washington. One has to go there to fully appreciate the success of our administration. The president has made good in a way to bring joy to every Democrat and satisfaction to every good citizen, regardless of his politics." This was the enthusiastic declaration of Z. L. Cobb today on his return from a month's trip to the national capital. "The tariff bill is going through all right, and it is going to be the right kind of a tariff," he continued. "The Democrats are supporting it loyally, and in the full debate in the house the Republicans were not able to point out any weak spots in the bill. A modern currency law that will meet the wishes of the administration will be enacted, too. "President Wilson has the confidence of the people and is sure to continue the most popular and successful president of our time. "Texas is certainly respected in Washington. We are represented by the foremost progressive Democrats. The way a Texas is treated makes us all more proud of our state. "I do not feel free to quote anyone about my own political prospects concerning the El Paso collectorship, but I can say the situation looks good to me. I have the pleasure of knowing a few members of the cabinet. I like each of them better after this trip. "The conference of water users with the secretary of the interior did much good from our standpoint. Such matters as we might complain of will undoubtedly be remedied. I am sure the administration and the reclamation service officers are ready to our dam, as they certainly should be. The hearing demonstrated that ours is the best project of the west. The nations are better and the soil more productive than those of the northwest, and we have a better market and better transportation facilities than any other southwestern project. I feel confident that the dam will be pushed to its completion and that our farmers will enjoy the great prosperity to which they are entitled."
